

Steve Robertson

Steve Robertson is currently a lieutenant and area commander for the Glendale Police Department in Southern California. Throughout his 28 year law enforcement career, he has flown police helicopters as a line pilot, supervisor and chief pilot and ultimately as the manager of their regional air support program. Steve authored their Safety Management System (SMS) and their current safety and training program and is a long-time member of the Airborne Law Enforcement Association.

Steve is also a corporate captain (AW109) and director of flight safety for an international corporation and consults in aviation safety and crash/incident investigation. He is a proud graduate of the University of Southern California's Aviation Safety and Security Program where he now is an instructor. Steve is also a public safety aviation accreditation assessor for the Public Safety Aviation Accreditation Commission.

Steve earned his undergraduate degree in Management from Union Institute and University and his master's degree in Leadership from the University of Southern California. He is currently working toward his doctoral degree in Planning, Policy and Development also from the University of Southern California. He is conducting his research for his final project/dissertation in "The Role that Organizational Culture Plays in Aviation Safety." Steve holds a commercial certificate and is dual-rated in helicopters and fixed wing aircraft and enjoys flying his Beechcraft Bonanza in his free time.
